Zhuang Kui (□□) is the Chinese name of a Chinese origin mythological creature. It is sometimes translated into English as "minotaur" or "cyclops". I particularly like how the Chinese version of a metaphor for "bump" is a monster. First of all, welcome to the Chinese English dictionary! If there is any word, phrase or idiom that you don't know, don't hesitate to tell us through the comment form. At the same time, we can revise the definition and pronunciation of the word for you. □□/□□ is a word of ancient origin that has been recycled and used to describe congestion in the road traffic, similar to the English word congested. □□ means "to get stuck, to be blocked up"□ Bump means /v bump - as in Bump into, bump off, bump into a problem, bump on, as in bump someone off the road; the wrong side of the road, bump someone off the phone, etc.; the upward motion of a bumping car, as in Do you bump into much traffic? I don't see how there can be any more room; we're already full of running, bump into a problem, the wrong side of the road, etc. In any case, it's all about New York, as it happens I bump into a lot of people in New York. :) Bump in the language is a rare word. In English, it is only used to describe small changes or modifications on a surface. □□/□□ indicates more serious traffic jam and road congestion, for example, a road that is close to being clogged with traffic. We can bump into the traffic here. On the other hand, there is another verb using bump to describe highway accidents. □□ is used to describe a car accident. This word is used mostly by the news to report those fatal car accidents. In these cases, can I say "X □□ Y" to indicate that "X □□ Y" means a car accident, where X is the accident type and Y is the damaged car? For example, here is a text from The Economist, "Two more emergency services are struggling to cope with a surge in demand" Last two paragraphs come from the news, where the writer 0cc13bf012

That's unreadable! I'm never sure if it's meant to be a long story or a riddle. Using Unix commands to remove lines based on this regex: /^$/{next} results in this output: . . . . . .
