Wippe.uproxy.link. Adjuvant radiotherapy for supraglottic cancer. To determine the impact of total laryngectomy and postoperative radiation therapy on survival in patients with supraglottic squamous cell carcinoma (SCC). Seventy-six patients with early T1-2 supraglottic SCC were treated by total laryngectomy and postoperative radiation therapy from 1978 to 1992. The distribution of pathologic features and the status of pretreatment recurrent laryngeal nerve function were analyzed and compared between patients with and without postoperative radiation therapy. Cox proportional hazard models were used to identify the impact of these risk factors on survival. Of the 76 patients, 41 (53%) were treated with postoperative radiation therapy. The 5-year disease-specific survival rate of patients treated by postoperative radiation therapy was 63% (95% confidence interval (CI), 41-77%), compared with 26% (95% CI, 0-45%) for patients not treated with postoperative radiation therapy (P =.008). The 5-year progression-free survival rate for patients treated with postoperative radiation therapy was 37% (95% CI, 11-64%), compared with 11% (95% CI, 0-29%) for patients not treated with radiation therapy (P =.057). Both the status of recurrent laryngeal nerve function and the extent of pathological T were independent predictors of survival, but the administration of postoperative radiation therapy did not improve survival in these patients. Postoperative radiation therapy significantly improved survival for patients with early supraglottic T1-2 SCC. Postoperative radiation therapy decreased the incidence of local failure and distant metastasis. The status of recurrent laryngeal nerve function was the most important factor in predicting survival, and the addition of postoperative radiation therapy did not increase disease-free survival.1.
