A novel method for the remediation of aquaculture water contaminated with chlorine is proposed. Activated carbon (AC) was used as an adsorbent in the method. The glass coating of the container was a core material, and the polymer shell was an insulator. When the container was filled with the contaminated water, the chlorine in the water solution penetrated through the surface of the glass, and trapped between the AC layer and the polymer shell. Due to this trapping, the chlorine was less available in the solution, and therefore the concentration of chlorine was decreased. After the container was removed, the solution of the polymer shell was removed from the glass container, and the chlorine content in the solution was increased. In addition, the trapped chlorine was removed from the glass container and was replaced by ions which were released from the surface of the glass by the heat. Thus, the ions were introduced into the solution. The effect of the
