Form libraries in AutoCAD allow the display of forms created by third parties for documentation purposes. Controlling the user interface AutoCAD is an Application Programming Interface (API) with pre-defined menus, windows, tools and command options. In order to customize AutoCAD to fit the user's needs, it is necessary to create macros or macros, which are recorded actions and scripts. Processes to create macros include: Interaction with the user interface (UI) that contain the desired actions to perform on the screen or in the drawing itself. It is based on the principle of transaction programming, the record of transactions. Executing macros by direct access from a programming language (application programming interface or API) that allows users to write their own procedures. The UI is defined in the initial setup of AutoCAD (Window Selection and Setup/Options) with a command line or a GUI. The user can also add their own specific controls or dialog windows to the interface (programmer's interface). Macros can be created from an application program, visual programming tool, macro recording tool or from the command line (command-line interface or CLI). Actions Macro and dialog actions are defined in the application's interface. There are three main categories of actions: Macro actions are recorded operations. Dialog actions are recorded as a user chooses from a dialog, window or command prompt. Commands are defined as commands provided by AutoCAD itself. Macros Macros are recorded actions. It is through macros that commands and dialog actions can be recorded. Using a macro is one of the ways to automate AutoCAD and perform a task. There are a number of different ways to use macros. Macro shortcut Macro shortcut are defined through the menu command Edit - User Macro - Macro Creation. The Macro Shortcut dialog is displayed. The user can choose the menu item macro shortcut from the Macro Option menu and follow the prompts. They are: Record macro actions Record macro actions can be recorded by choosing menu command Edit - User Macro - Macros and recording the actions. This can be done for each action, or for the whole script, in which case the user must press "End" after recording. The only parameter that can be passed during a recording is the actions, which are all recorded as a sequence of commands (separated by semicolons). After recording is finished, 5b5f913d15
