The invention relates to a cross-head assembly for a press. More particularly, the invention relates to a cross-head assembly in which mounting of the cross-head to the press frame is simplified. Cross-head assemblies for presses are well known in the art. These cross-head assemblies, commonly referred to as end-driers, are attached to the press at the end opposite to the feeder. In operation, the end-drier moves towards the feeder to press the stock. As the end-drier approaches the feeder, the forces applied to the end-drier from the press frame are increased. Accordingly, these assemblies are typically manufactured to be larger than a traditional roller and sprocket press in order to withstand the increased forces. For many years, there has been a trend to
