Q: What kind of anomalies can make a gravity lens have zero tidal forces? The gravity lens is a hypothetical object in theory which changes the gravitational pull on a nearby star. In reality, the star is pulled by the Andromeda Galaxy and would be pulled very close to the gravity lens in this case. From what I know, the gravitational field is a vector field. This means that if the field points out to the same direction as gravity then the object the field is acting on will be pulled towards the field source. So, my question is what kind of anomalies can make a gravity lens have zero tidal forces on its nearby star, hence, not pulling it at all? A: There are a number of things that would need to happen. In order for a gravity lensing object to successfully cause the star it is gravitationally linked to to fall inward, there needs to be another huge mass of the same density (10^6 or 10^8 the mass of the star) which is more or less static with respect to the gravity lensing object, the gravity lensing object needs to be much larger than the star (which will be inescapably falling inward due to the tidal pull of the other mass), the lensing object needs to be more massive than the star the gravity lensing object needs to be between the star and the first of the two masses. These properties happen to be the property of the Schwarzschild solution, which is what general relativity is based on (for a static, uncharged, non-rotating mass, and no electric charge). For a Schwarzschild object to be more massive than a star, the star needs to be very small in comparison to it. [Temperature-dependent oligonucleotide structure identified by an elevated-temperature gradient gel electrophoresis method]. To develop an elevated-temperature gradient gel electrophoresis (ET-GTGE) method to examine the melting temperatures (T_m) and the melting structures of oligonucleotides at different temperatures. ET-GTGE used 30% and 50% polyacrylamide gel (pAG) with gel factors (GF) of 80 and 175, respectively. An automated sequencing service was used to analyze the data of ET-GTGE. Q: How do you use the find method in mongoose (v5)? Supposed I have a structure like the one below, where the User record has a collection called 'Interests' that has a containsSubdocument array. { "userID": 123, "content": "my content", "interests": [{ "id": 1, "interest": "sports" }, { "id": 2, "interest": "reading" }] } I want to find a user who has the most interests that contain the 'reading' interest. So, I would do something like: mongoose.find({ userID: 123, interests: { $in: ['reading'] } }).sort('-interests.$[].interest').limit(10) However, that doesn't work. I would need to run a separate query for each subdocument. How can I do this? A: mongoose.model('User').find({ 'userID': 123, 'interests.interest': { $in: ['reading'] } }, { 'interests.$id': 1 }, function (err, doc) { //now `doc` is an instance of MongooseDocument console.log(doc) }) You can also use dot notation, as in the OP's proposed approach. Q: Difference between onClick and onClickListener? In an android class I see two methods for events. The one is `onClick` and the other one is `onClickListener`. What is the difference between them? What should be used when? A: It just means that which one you want to use. If you want to attach an `OnClickListener` to a button then you can use the method
