This invention relates to molding machines, and more particularly to systems for molding articles in dies where mold cavities are engaged to form the articles. In the field of molded golf balls, several attempts have been made in the past to achieve the optimum combination of rebound characteristics, feel, sound and appearance when a molded article is struck. It is highly desirable to achieve this combination, and to maintain it, as well as other criteria, throughout the life of the molded article. In the prior art, as in U.S. Pat. No. 3,802,336 issued Apr. 9, 1974 to Olson, in an effort to achieve consistency in the molded article, molding systems included hydraulic pressures in a molding chamber to maintain a molded object in a mold cavity at a selected internal pressure. When molded objects are released, the hydraulic pressures are relieved so that the molded objects drop, by gravity, to a cooling station where they are cooled and, if necessary, trimmed of excess material. These systems provide generally satisfactory results, but can be costly in terms of machine operating cost. In U.S. Pat. No. 3,853,025 issued Dec. 10, 1974 to Olson, a constant pressure molding system is disclosed which utilizes a hydraulic cylinder to create a pressure on a charge of material molded in a mold cavity and a hydraulic cylinder around the mold cavity, so that the constant pressure is maintained. The hydraulic cylinders include diaphragms, and are so arranged that the pressure is evenly distributed around the mold cavity, to achieve a more uniform internal pressure in the molded object. In U.S. Pat. No. 4,707,156 issued Nov. 17, 1987 to Webster, a method of molding large, high-density foam products is disclosed in which a
