One application is in the manufacture of semiconductor wafers. As is known, a semiconductor wafer is processed to a highly sophisticated degree in order to achieve the desired end result, i.e., a semiconductor device. Many of the processes involved with the manufacture of semiconductor devices utilize semiconductor balls such as, for example, dice or packaged devices. In order to effectuate these processes, the semiconductor balls must be precisely positioned relative to a reference structure. As is known to those in the art, a ball-trap apparatus functions to position a semiconductor ball relative to a reference structure. The ball-trap apparatus is designed so as to accept a semiconductor ball and then position the semiconductor ball relative to a reference structure in a precision manner. In particular, during the manufacture of a semiconductor wafer, the ball-trap apparatus is used to precisely position a semiconductor ball relative to a reference structure at a fabrication point. If a semiconductor ball is not precisely positioned relative to a reference structure at the fabrication point, there is a potential that a subsequent process may damage or destroy the semiconductor ball. As a result, it is important to ensure that the ball-trap apparatus positions the semiconductor ball in a precisely aligned manner relative to a reference structure so as to avoid the above-mentioned problems. Known ball-trap apparatus are typically used to position a semiconductor ball relative to a reference structure by clamping the semiconductor ball in a cavity formed by a stationary clamping device and a movable clamping device. The stationary clamping device is connected to the reference structure, and the movable clamping device moves toward and away from the stationary clamping device, thereby clamping the semiconductor ball in the
