please help Apr 4, 2010 I downloaded and compiled the fixed version of Mitchell On Demand 5.8.2.35 2015 from I've compiled it for Linux 32 bit. It shows the same crashes I'm getting.Q: Shortcuts in batch files for using Data Driven Redirect I know in a batch file you can use the?> tag to redirect output to the file %TEMP%\Copy.log. However, I've used this structure for years on command line and haven't ever needed to have a substitution variable for %TEMP%. When I'm writing a batch file to move files and make copies, I've been using this statement on its own line: XCOPY /s /y E:\source\Folder1\folder2\folder3\%~1\%~1-No-Ext.%~2 %TEMP%\Copy.log Is there a way to use the substitution variable?TEMP? or some other simple shortcut so I don't have to remember to include that in any of my batch files? A: It's not simple in a way. No, it is not the simplest way to do this.
However, you could write a.bat file that simply calls the batch file you want to use (or at least, a simple batch file that contains all the code from that batch file). That would be the simplest way to do this for me, but I'm not a fan of code-in-one-file ideas. For your XCOPY example, you could write a .bat file as follows: @ "path to XCOPY batch file" %1 This will call the batch file for you, and supply it the path to the batch file as an argument. If you need to use wildcards, that can be done too. Note that XCOPY on its own may have issues when passing wildcards, but the XCOPY.BAT file should work with wildcards too. Other than that, there are even more "universal" functions that can be used that are not using a batch file at all, so you could use a for-loop or a find-command to provide that functionality. For instance,
