John Baldessari is an American conceptual artist based in Los Angeles, California. He is best known for his large-scale paintings that explore the use of color in painting. Baldessari is a pioneer of color field painting and a leading figure in the California Art Club, which he co-founded in 1962. Among his works are the "All American Picture," which hangs in the National Gallery of Art; a 19-foot-by-11-foot painting of a New York subway station called "The City of New York Is Under Water"; and the painting in the U.S. Capitol Building called "Fractured America" (1984). The full archive of John Baldessari artwork can be viewed at JohnBaldessari.com. Binary phase coding of a multi-color video signal has conventionally been realized with two stages of phase codes. For example, in order to output an output video signal having 6 bits per color for a NTSC signal which has a sampling frequency of 13.5 MHz and which is in the ratio of 1:2 for one field of picture, binary phase coding is carried out with phase codes of 2 bits in a first stage of binary phase coding for each color, and binary phase coding is carried out with phase codes of 3 bits in a second stage of binary phase coding for the overall colors of RGB, resulting in binary codes of 5 bits per field for each color. Therefore, when 4 bits of phase codes are allocated to each of the three colors of RGB, binary phase coding is carried out with a total of 12 bits of phase codes, resulting in binary phase codes of 48 bits for one field. A circuit for implementing such binary phase coding is described in the reference "A Digital Encoding and Decoding Method For Television Picture Display" T. Nishida et al., Technical Report of the Institute of Television Engineers of Japan, Information and Communications Society, SB-105, Vol. 14.
