Short profile of endogenous PMP22 mutants. Duchenne muscular dystrophy (DMD) is caused by mutations in the X-linked human gene coding for the protein desmin. This mutant protein is present in all muscle cells in DMD, resulting in the progressive destruction of skeletal muscle. The most frequent mutations that are observed in DMD, are deletions of the repeated sequence Gly-Arg-Gly-Asp (GRGD) (for mutated protein domain) in exon 23. We created a novel vector, referred to as RMC vector, in order to selectively express mutant PMP22 proteins in transgenic mice, and can be used to create transgenic mice with different lengths of GRGD repeat deletion. Thus, it can be used as a useful test system for quantifying expression of mutant protein in vivo. Our results demonstrate that the length of GRGD repeat deletion in the transgene can be easily quantified by measuring the levels of protein expressed in vivo. PMP22 mutants with repeat deletion in the transgene were accurately detected by immunohistochemistry, as well as by Western blotting. Furthermore, levels of mutant protein are in direct proportion to the length of deletions in the transgene.
