I'm looking to add a WebService to a managed package that I'm creating on behalf of our support team. Thanks in advance. A: Yes, it is very easy to create a WebService. No, you do not have to use Apex. We can easily create a Java WebService and call it directly from the Client Machine. No need to add Apex in the package. Search This Blog Sunday, May 22, 2013 Thoughts on Service and Leadership Last night I was attending a spiritual retreat in the mountains of Southern California, and the topic that kept coming up from the various speakers and facilitators was this: the need to serve. We were talking about leadership, which is the theme of our retreat. Leadership is defined as - A process, carried out by any leader, of guiding, energizing and empowering subordinates . I've written before about service, and the ways that we are sometimes called to serve in a physical, concrete way. Both are challenging, and neither are simple. I struggle with the notion of service, though. Not specifically with the physical, concrete sense, which for me, often requires sacrificing other responsibilities, obligations, and even dreams. I struggle with the impossibility of giving unspoiled service. We all know this, yet we continue to forget. The biggest struggle is that of leadership. The world has all the labels, laws, rules, and requirements to codify leadership and service. Someone can be elected, or appointed to be a leader, or appointed to be a service leader. There are so many rules about what constitutes leadership that some of them are contradictory, like a Peter Principle for Leadership. I am reminded of the quote that all mediocre leaders chase the big job, and all small jobs run from the big job. Part of the challenge of leadership, though, is that we're all different. We are all driven by different motivations, have different abilities, talents, skills, desires e79caf774b

It is one of the most lethal substances to infect a human—killing by precisely targeting the nerves of the muscles and muscles that control the nerves that trigger the brain’s voluntary muscles. Enter, a botulinum-toxin drug being developed by Kazuhiko Murakami, a professor of microbiology at Tokyo University of Science, and Tsuneko Kikuchi, an associate professor in the Division of

Comparative Medicine at Nara Medical University, which can be administered via a noninvasive route. According to a paper published recently in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, Enter “will be one of the most effective and safe drugs against botulism currently available.” “These are two brilliant researchers who are doing some wonderful work on pharmaceuticals,” says Jeffrey Lieberman, president of the non-profit Nervous System Disorders Association. “I’m very excited to see their achievements.” Murakami and Kikuchi may not be well known outside the field of botulism, but they have been working in it for decades. They both are experts on the chemical composition of the toxin, as well as the genetic makeup of the bacterium and its evolution. In the 1990s, they identified the biotoxins as a family of related compounds named clostridium botulinum neurotoxins. They came up with a hypothesis that explains how the toxins get into the nerve endings that control the muscles and trigger their contraction. The toxin can enter nerve endings by dissolving in fluids that bathe the skin. Because of the way the toxin changes the structure of the protein that binds it, it can only get to the nerve endings by diffusing through layers of skin that secrete a protein known as a sodium channel. It can then dissolve into the fluids that bathe these nerves. The toxin then changes the structure of this sodium channel, creating a mechanical catch to keep the toxin on
