Eosinophilic pustular folliculitis in children: a series of 30 cases with one-year follow-up. Eosinophilic pustular folliculitis (EPF) is a rare skin disorder that primarily affects young adults but it may also occur in children. EPF is characterized by the abrupt appearance of follicular pustules, papulopustular lesions, and a centrifugal distribution of the follicular lesions on the face and trunk. In the present study, we document the clinical and histopathological findings of 30 patients (21 males and nine females) with EPF referred to our department over a 1-year period. All of the patients presented with a rapidly appearing papulopustular eruption, with the largest lesions occurring on the face, neck, and trunk. Bacteria were cultured from 13 of the 30 cases. Histology and direct immunofluorescence showed intradermal infiltrates and follicular occlusion by eosinophilic lymphocytes with a central core of neutrophils. Direct immunofluorescence was positive for IgA in 18 patients and for C3 in 16 patients. The majority of these IgA cases (95%) had associated serum IgA deficiency. The age distribution of the patients ranged from 2 to 16 years (mean, 9.4 years). Nineteen patients had systemic or atopic disease, such as asthma and atopic dermatitis. Children with EPF are more likely to have associated disease or to be immunocompromised than adults. The histopathology of EPF is nonspecific; direct immunofluorescence is useful. The main treatment is corticosteroid therapy. Sheriff's deputies who are

The common law definition requires women to feel violated, which can be difficult to prove in a court of law. The word upskirting was created in 2009 by a British man, who thought "upskirting" was the perfect word to describe the illegal act of a stranger peeping up a woman's skirt at a festival.
