By Kim Dopson | December 12, 2013 Modern wind turbines on a post-hurricane Louisiana farm. wind turbines On a post-hurricane Louisiana farm, farmers with large enough parcels are increasingly leasing out their land to wind turbine and other energy projects, but they still have their share of naysayers. Modern wind turbines on a post-hurricane Louisiana farm. Courtesy of The Mays. One proposed wind farm in the territory of a Native American tribe in the Great Plains could send electricity to 100,000 homes, but it's also dividing the tribe over a number of environmental and financial issues. There are also concerns that the project, which would be the largest wind farm ever built in the Great Plains, would make it harder for the tribe to economically develop its own wind power as the cost per kilowatt hour for electricity produced by wind power continues to decline. Renewables. "We feel we are economically handicapped," says Donnie Mays, a tribal councilman of the Crow Creek Sioux Tribe. The Crow Creek Sioux Tribe is in the process of leasing
