First demonstrated in the demo for FIFA 19, HyperMotion Technology works by running a match from start to finish using the exact same match data, then isolating and removing moves players make during gameplay. We've seen players kick off, earn free-kicks, shoot from distance, dribble, pick out a team-mate or player, pass or assist, and score a goal. The same animations will work for all players, so the moment-to-moment gameplay is exactly the same for everyone. So let's take a look at how it works. Generating an animation Before animating a match, we need the ability to map and process real-life game data to an in-game script. This is a very critical step. If the movement and performance data we want doesn't map to an in-game script, the animation will be off. So we'll be looking at the production of a full match, in a creative director role. Let's take a look at an example of this step in action. Here's a simple example of a player taking a shot from outside the box. Pre-Animation Data As you can see, data comes in from the player's joints, and limbs are joined together. Some data can be taken from the field, such as the crossbar positions, and some data is gathered from the player, such as the player's height and weight. This data is then mapped to a humanoid skeleton that represents the player in a 3D game world. This 3D game world is populated with player control models and some background props. Each model is animated using the same movements used in the production of the game. Each model is an iteration of the player and every player model has its own unique animation. Players are also wrapped in a visual cloth, which allows us to better animate the player wearing it. The result is a customized full-body player animation. Exploring the result Look at the first animation in the GIF above. Each joint in a player's model needs to do an animation. Every joint in the player models will be used during gameplay. We use the same step to animate one player model as we do when animating multiple player models. The combination of human movement and game data allows us to generate an animation with the exact same on
