The U.S. military has partnered with the local government to support multiple operations that have been conducted in the province, said acting U.S. Ambassador to Afghanistan James C. McHenry. The U.S. remains committed to supporting the Afghan people and to working with them to establish and build a new Afghanistan, he said. “We are in the midst of a difficult fight,” McHenry said at the Atlantic Council here. “There is an Afghan-led fight that will determine the progress we will make. We are working hard to help the Afghan people build their own institutions.” In Uruzgan, more than 10,000 insurgents were removed from the city, the provincial governor said March 18. Supported by U.S. airpower, Afghan and coalition forces conducted a “precision strike,” he said, that targeted insurgents who were hostile to the Afghan government. Along with other coalition airpower, the U.S. provided close air support, as well as fire support, in the battle to regain control of Uruzgan from the insurgents, said Col. Jeffery Lee, a spokesman for U.S. Southern Command. The Afghan operation began March 11 with aerial bombings and then continued through March 19. About 60 U.S. and 40 Afghan soldiers and police officers took part in the operation. “We are looking for guys on motorcycles. We’re in the city. We’re hitting guys in the city,” said Lee. ♦
