Cars.Comparing the in vivo and in vitro permeability coefficients of quinidine and procainamide. The effect of age on the in vitro and in vivo permeability of quinidine and procainamide was investigated in beagle dogs and rats. In five clinically normal dogs both quinidine and procainamide were equally well absorbed by oral and intravenous routes. Neither drug produced significant alterations in heart rate or blood pressure. In seven rats, the in vitro relative permeability of quinidine to procainamide (Q/P) was 5.2 compared to 1.0 in dogs and was not significantly changed by age. The in vivo Papp of quinidine and procainamide, by oral or intravenous administration, was examined in 18 clinically normal dogs and 36 rats. The Papp values of both drugs increased with age in the dogs and rats. The largest changes were observed with the oral route of administration. The ratio of the oral to the intravenous Papp of quinidine was significantly greater in rats than in dogs. The oral Papp of quinidine was also greater than that of procainamide in both species. The oral bioavailability of quinidine compared to procainamide increased with age in both dogs and rats. I am out today so I can't resist. I just thought I'd share this fun anecdote. In the pre-Social Security days, in the 1920s, a box arrived at my house from the United States Post Office. I opened the box and saw that it was filled with four large, square, very heavy, paper books. I opened the first one and discovered it was a recipe book. The second book was a measure book. The third book was a book of stamps. The last book contained a booklet of five printed instructions for the third class mail, also known as "letters." I had never heard of a "letters" stamp. The booklet of instructions for the third class mail was called Postmaster's Manual because it was designed for the clerks who worked in the post offices and who were the only ones who had a position higher than the third class mailer. I looked up at the stamp and I noticed it had a picture of the post office. I looked at d0c515b9f4
