Demo 1 - Warhammer 40,000: Eternal Crusade Demo 2 - Shroud of the Avatar -- Hide Caption 1 / 1 Adding Adventure to a Living City If you want the thrill of adventure, and an opportunity to live out your fantasies, we need to talk. Head back to our water-level elevator and step on board. This time, we'll take you to the streets, indoors. Arcadia is inhabited by living people. NPCs wander the streets, shop for their goods, and spend their time off guard. It takes perspective as an old-time adventure bugaboo to truly appreciate the nature of the city. The vast majority of the population - the characters you meet - is indoors; much of it is outside. Living streets can include shops, houses, and of course, these people. They have their own needs and desires, and the city can be a place of adventure - or just a place to hide and do something normal. Despite the density, the game places lots of huge indoor terrain. For example, the back alleys of the city and the hidden residential quarters near the dal. How Do Living Rooms Work? Indoor locations can house a living room for your characters. In the city, you can find an assortment of interesting places, and each has different effect on a livin' room. Here's a basic rundown: A living room is a shop stocked with your average goods, although these might not be the goods players are accustomed to. Any registered player can share a living room during their time in the city, with the caveat that the market for the goods and services change with time. That is, the longer a player remains in Arcadia, the tougher they'll find the goods, attracting a more exclusive and adventurous clientele. How Does Arcadia Work? Arcadia's 3D city is built at a tall enough height that on the inside, indoors, your character could find they're standing on a cement floor. In Arcadia's interior, the upper and lower floors are separated by the city, with the terrain extending up into the sky. People roam the streets on the lower floors, weaved through the layers of the city. For the most part, the city is intentionally scripted to be very empty, although you'll find certain areas populated with people. The city is populated with NPCs, meaning players can notice other players, and some of these other people may have an agenda
