What's new in Sallywag's Honor:

, New South Wales Aurora is a village in northern New South Wales, Australia and part of the Bulli Shire. At the, the population of the Aurora Service Centre and surrounding areas was 16,804 people. Etymology The area was originally called "Country Hill". Records of the locality document the name "Sholins Plains". This, named after the Sholings (Shelleys) area in Argyle. Prior to European settlement, the area was home to the indigenous Mangarew people and their families. One of the original owner of the land was William Shilling. His land was mostly surveyed in in 1826. Shilling, along with his five sons, all christened the village Aurora. Aurora is named after The Lovell Telescope, also known as Aurora. History Initially, Aurora's population was only approximately 320. However, in 1870, Victoria Cross Medalist Sergeant Bramwell, father of Sir Clement Percival Bramwell, came to the area. He was building a homestead but was killed when the home was blown over by a storm. It was then that the name of the settlement was changed from Country Hill, to Auroroi, due to the area being Auroroi, or gold crescent, and there were reports of gold being found at the site. Aurora Post Office opened around 1869. In 1886, the railway to Whatawarrin Pass was being constructed. This would have provided a less difficult access from Sydney via the Southern Railway that went south along the coast. However, plans for the rail route had changed, diverting the railway further to the north and the Southern Railway was re-routed to the Berry Branch. The railway line was also extended to Sussex, however the track was not eventually constructed any further north. The Sholins Plains Public School opened in 1892. Its first headmaster was Mr. Maurice Sweet. As a child, Mr Sweet was a pupil at the local Public School and Auditorium, the school which is now Aurora Primary School. In 1897 the Sholings Hols family took up land together with William Shilling. They were all travelling salesmen looking for new locations to settle. They came to the Paradise Inn, which was next to the field that would become Aurora. They sold up their land in the area for £27. Founded a store and helped to raise the community. A few years

... "It's a good example of the word "living" as a concept. You have to have some kind of ethics, and you have to have some kind of goal. And the goal in this game is to make yourself more powerful. We want the first ten people that play to be the twenty-seventh, so the gap is getting bigger and bigger. The more you play, the more you get the feeling of what it's like to be a spy, and then you want to try something different." -Steven Wittens, Director New Venture - May 6th, 1996 "It's a heist game. The world you're in is cyberspace, and the whole game is based around stealing information. You hack into their servers, steal documents and information. Take them offline. You have a bank account, of course, and you can transfer money from that bank account. You can make contacts. You can create new identities. You can disguise yourself and infiltrate other corporations. As you steal information, you can also use that same information to take over other people's computers, and make money from them. You've got a 3D interface. You've got a weapons menu, which is very varied. There's handguns, sniper rifles, heavy automatic weapons. All sorts of hardware." -Steven Wittens New Venture - May 6th, 1996 "The biggest difference between this game and others is that we have no Artificial Intelligence. The game is a single player game, and it's all done through the use of a text mode. So what we're doing is writing code, and when we start talking about text modes in text mode, we're talking about a txt mode. You have no graphic display. It's a one-player game. You take on the role of a hacker. You start out as an ex-convict who gets out after serving three years and eight months in prison for credit card fraud." -Steven Wittens New Venture - May 6th, 1996 "The game is developing nicely. We're very happy. We've got lots of employees and we're going to expand further. We're developing software and we're all excited about it." -Steven Wittens Gameplay Trailer - June 21st, 1996 "The world is a cy
