The bill comes in response to the case of Omar Khadr, a Canadian citizen who spent 13 years in custody at Bagram Air Base, and now sits in custody at Guantanamo Bay. Khadr was charged in a politically motivated war crimes tribunal that violated his constitutional rights and has since been released. “The bill I am proposing ensures that each and every accused serviceman or woman receives a fair hearing by an impartial military commission,” said Sherman. “This is necessary because the prosecution of the detainee cases at Guantanamo has been plagued by discovery abuses, misinformation from the CIA, and otherwise unfair actions. In many ways, we can understand why the Obama Administration has done everything it can to avoid prosecution of members of our armed forces. Unfortunately, this Bill requires the Obama Administration to comply with constitutional principles, as well as the Geneva Conventions. The administration must not use these cases to escape prosecution for serious crimes and instead must follow the law.” Khadr was an 18-year-old combatant when he was captured on fire in Afghanistan in 2002. After a 5-year trial at Guantanamo, he was convicted in July 2010 of murder and other charges including terrorism and conspiracy, while multiple counts of material support for terrorism were dropped. He was sentenced to a 30-year prison term but has since been released. Sherman has repeatedly advocated for the rehabilitation of veterans accused of war crimes, and has repeatedly called for an investigation and accountability for the abuse and torture committed by some agencies of the U.S. government. Earlier this year, he wrote a letter to President Obama asking him to do the following: • Investigate the United States military for their
