John Lewis, after the Georgia congressman on Tuesday told a news conference that the Republican had been talking with the KKK and was all talk. "I've been to his office, I've met with him, I've been to his home, I've been in his office," Lewis said, recounting his many interactions with Trump. "You don't take that kind of language at the White House. You don't talk about anybody in that way. You just don't do that." Lewis' comments came after Trump tweeted about the Civil Rights Movement and its participants, saying they include "everyone who wants to get involved and no more professionalizing politicians." What's new in Spinch:

reported that some fashion brands have been donating to one of the three funds created by the Fashion Industries Charitable Foundation to benefit the victims of Hurricane Harvey, which is still going on. Globally, the donation total stands at $2.9 million, according to the Times. "It's great to be able to use what we've done to be of service to the hurricane victims. We're still getting reports from these people and I think it's very inspiring for these people after all of this," Erika said. Photo credit: Win McNamee/ Getty

President Donald Trump slapped down House Oversight Committee Chairman Elijah Cummings after the Baltimore-native demanded a federal investigation into a border-nazi's tax crimes. Earlier in the day on Sunday, Cummings accused the White House of "operating like they're in some type of bunker." Later, in a House committee hearing with Housing and Urban Development Secretary Ben Carson, Cummings dismissed Carson's assessment that immigration "is the biggest issue facing the White House" as "the height of insincerity." Rep. Cummings' attacks—which include accusing the White House of "delay tactics," "stonewalling" and "covering things up"—hint at a potential impeachment, but don't yet reach that threshold. While Cummings still has not filed official charges, it's likely that the House Budget Committee head sees sanctions against Trump in his future, writes The Washington Post. “The White House has been stonewalling Congress on just about every issue for months now.” “If he fails to respect the Committees of jurisdiction in good faith, then maybe there’s an issue of contempt,” Cummings told the ABC’s Jonathan Karl when asked if he’s filed a contempt document. That hasn’t happened yet, according to CNBC. Rep. Cummings is still going through the procedure of getting other Democratic committee heads on board. Pressed by Karl as to what exactly he thought the White House was “stonewalling,” Cummings said: “We’ve had eight public hearings. They have refused to hand over the documents. We’ve tried to get documents. This is not a one-sided process. It’s not even a two-sided process. It is a two
