I'm trying to make something a bit more accessible: The red spaces are supposed to be divs and the black bars are supposed to be divs. If you move the cursor over a bar, you'll see that the widths of the divs need to adapt to the cursor width. But even with this code below, the widths don't adjust depending on the width of the cursor. I created two methods (makeRow and makeRow1) to change the width of the cells depending on the width of the cursor. It works, but the problem is that the first one only adjusts the width of the elements at the left (or the first row), while the second one takes the elements in the whole row and doesn't show the elements at the right of the row. ME! Chirpy, chirply and chirping: The Meadow comic book review It's a chilly autumn day in the heath, Chirpy and his flock are taking their usual walk, when... The Meadow comic book review by Tracey G Humans, gryphons, wryfeet, Red Dragons, faeries, and anything else that was related to birch trees (and sometimes anyone – even elves – that lived near some birch trees.) And, a talking meadow. I tell you, TUSHIA! I tell you TUSHIA, there is no fauna in HEPHELUS. Fauna had moved on long ago; no matter – many species of fauna have decided to look for a greener pasture. No one will be missed. This comic book was written by Bryan Talbot, an Irish artist who is better known as an author of graphic novels and animation. His work includes such titles as: The Adventures of Luther Arkwright, Dead Alice, and Babylon 5. The story is loosely based on the folktales of the same name, widely known in both the UK and US. The modern-day tale had its roots in Gothic horror, being adopted by a group of artist, writers and illustrators in the 1970s. Some of them eventually started to produce standalone stories. This is one of those tales. Meadow was published in 1993 by Kitchen Sink and is released as a Taurus comic book. It tells the tale of Chirpy and his flock who are part of the Hill's Poets Society and are friends with Red which is the narrator. The story details their adventures. The plot is simple – there isn't one! It's told by the meadow – a forest of words with whom the humans talk. There are a few odd vignettes at the beginning detailing White Wolf, a talking cat and Peeping Adam. There are even a few pages with tombstones. Wow, that's a lot of information – what a narrator this is! And yes, Chirpy loves to talk as do his human friends that he's made. Chirpy and Puck are both very much half-bird half-gryphon, smartening
