Alcohol in the liver: effects on intracellular Ca²⁺ homeostasis and membrane lipid composition. Alcoholic liver disease (ALD) is characterized by infiltration of immune cells into the liver resulting in tissue injury. Alcohol is known to affect intracellular Ca²⁺ homeostasis and several ion transporters and pumps have been associated with cellular effects of ethanol.

Here, we investigate the effects of ethanol on intracellular Ca²⁺ homeostasis in rat hepatocytes. We showed that ethanol induces long lasting Ca²⁺ oscillations with a peak at 60 min. This effect is prevented by blocking gap-junctions and is not reproduced in the presence of extracellular Ca²⁺. Injection of phospholipase C (PLC) which cleaves membrane phosphatidylinositol (PI) into inositol

1,4,5-trisphosphate (IP₃) and diacylglycerol (DAG) results in Ca²⁺ oscillations that are completely blocked by the IP₃ receptor antagonist Xestospongin C (Xes C). We show that the membrane lipid composition in isolated hepatocytes is affected by alcohol. The degree of unsaturation of ethanol-exposed hepatocytes is decreased. Ethanol does not affect arachidonate enrichment, but increases monounsaturated fatty acids, linoleate and stearate, indicating an enrichment of total polyunsaturated fatty acids with a substantial decrease in linolenate. This indicates a modification of the fatty acid pattern in membrane lipids.Q: A

In the past, electronic systems have been provided with a data bus which allow for the exchange of data signals among a plurality of functional units of the electronic system. Such functional units may include, for example, a processor, a memory, a memory controller, a video controller, etc. Over the years, as the speed and complexity of these systems has increased, the number of functional units has also increased, resulting in higher density packaging, and the need for improved ways of interconnecting those functional units. One conventional approach is to provide a printed circuit board, and a plurality of small, high density connectors which connect the various functional units to the printed circuit board. In this way, the printed circuit board and the connectors may be used to provide interconnections between the functional units. In this conventional configuration, the printed circuit board is often a flexible or semi-flexible printed circuit board, which allows for its routing, rerouting, and overall flexibility in that the printed circuit board flexes in response to the various devices which are connected thereto. However, this conventional approach has a drawback in that the printed circuit board is typically difficult to attach to the individual functional units, and difficult to remove, resulting in down-time of the electronic system. Another conventional approach for providing interconnections between functional units is to provide a plug-in connector, to which the functional units are connected. In this way, the number of units which need to be attached to the printed circuit board is minimized. However, in this conventional configuration, the size of each functional unit is limited by the size of the plug-in connectors, which can only accommodate a number of units that is limited. Furthermore, as the density of the functional units is increased, the number of such plug-in connectors is also increased. As a result
