Description of Related Art The fourth generation (4G) mobile communication technology has been adopted by wireless communication providers. The 4G mobile communication technology provides a user-centric service delivery, and makes network elements more efficient and flexible. For example, an asymmetric user-centric wireless access network may be configured by the 4G mobile communication technology. A user may control the access and upload data through a mobile station to a central station. Generally, a wireless communication system typically includes a control channel, a physical channel, a media access control (MAC) channel and a radio resource control (RRC) channel. The control channel is primarily used to control the physical channel, the media access control channel is primarily used to control the MAC channel, and the radio resource control channel is primarily used to control the RRC channel. In the conventional wireless communication system, an Enhanced Dedicated Physical Control Channel (E-DPCCH) and an E-DPCCH Bandwidth Request are defined in the 3rd Generation Partnership Project (3GPP) standard specification of Release 99 for a handover mechanism. The E-DPCCH includes three types of patterns: a start position flag (SPF), an address field (AF), and an end position flag (EPF). The SPF indicates a start position of a sequence, and the AF represents a length of the sequence. The E-DPCCH includes two patterns of AF lengths, and the lengths of the patterns are repeated in different sequences. Therefore, a user may use the SPF and AF to control a track of a timing of an E-DPCCH, and thereby perform a required handover. In the conventional wireless communication system,
