The brutal murder of a critically ill American student in cold blood at the hands of Mexican police is further evidence that the "harsh treatment" of immigrants by U.S. immigration authorities has produced a violent backlash, Amnesty International said today. It said Mexico's investigation and prosecution of the victim's alleged killers, and the refusal of the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency to acknowledge culpability or even cooperate with the Mexican investigation, have only intensified the violence. On Monday, U.S. Border Patrol agent Brian Terry was killed in Arizona, allegedly during an anti-drug operation that included ICE-trained Mexican police. In an unusual and highly charged phone call last week between Mexican President Felipe Calderon and U.S. President Barack Obama, the Calderon brought up the case. He said the killing was "very painful," as the U.S. authorities refused to cooperate with the Mexican investigation. "This brutal murder is a further indication that instead of ending the violent crackdown by Mexican police against migrants, it is provoking an atmosphere of fear and violence against migrants and vulnerable people in both countries," said Erika Guevara-Rosas, Amnesty International's Mexico researcher. "The Mexican authorities should make strong efforts to secure the full cooperation of U.S. authorities in the investigation of this case." Since 2006, at least 168 people have died in shootouts with police in Mexico as a result of the "war on drugs," according to the NGO. The group said at least 40 of the deaths involved a confrontation with US law enforcement personnel or Mexican law enforcement. but said that 70 percent of the total cases involved confrontations with police that took place in Mexico.
