I got the line above by taking a screen shot of the page using cheese, then using mjpgtojpeg to get a *.jpg image. Saving the image as a *.tar.gz and using the command line tool 'unp' to decompress it yielded a tar file. Getting the page source code using a browser (Firefox, Chrome, IE, etc.) was easy, but again, there was a lot of html. Basically the page is a big bundle of html that was all dynamically loaded using PHP. The page is stuffed with very large div tags, so to remove the headers and footers, I ended up using a custom script to strip the div tags. This is the script and the resulting file: * `#!/usr/local/bin/bash file=$1 n=0 for line in `cat $file`;do n=`expr $n + 1` if [ $n -eq 1 ]; then echo $line else n=$((n-1)) sed $n:1d $line | sed '1,/ $file.new mv $file.new $file rm $file.new *` The script has a few comments which tell you what to do. The script in question is used to strip all the divs from the page and get just the html. For my results, the script had to run on page1.html. Here's what the above script produced: Home
