Accordingly, it should be understood that these statements are to be read in this light and not as admissions of prior art. In the oil and gas industry, it is common for large diameter primary wells to be drilled from a platform to greater depths than can be reached with a drill string fitted with a conventional drilling rig. An additional casing string is added to the primary well during completion of the primary well and this is followed by drill strings and the drilling of additional primary wells extending from the platform to the desired location. The platform may be located on or off the seabed and in some cases there are sea-water driven wells, an on-land or on-shore water or land-based primary well and an offshore rig to set the casing string and drill off the platform.

Alternatively, the primary well may be drilled at a site other than the platform, and the casing string may be set onshore using a floating vessel. The main objective of casing is to prevent collapse of the borehole at the location of the casing, which is usually the bottom of the well. In this way, the inherent stresses in the formation are not readily transmitted to the wellhead and this may lead to unnecessary damage to the wellhead and associated components. In many cases, the casing is extended through a distance from the platform to the desired depth of the primary well. In other cases, the casing is set on a floating vessel and this may be a floating drilling rig (FDR) or a semisubmersible rig or any other floating vessel. Casing typically comprises one or two concentrically arranged strings of tubulars. Each string is typically laid from a vertical lay-down position, by a cable reeved from a drum on the vessel. The depth at which the casing string is set is determined by the length of the casing string and the position of the drum relative to the vessel. The position of the drum relative to the platform is normally dictated by the length of pipe to be laid. In a typical lay, a casing string with a total length of around 300 m is accommodated by placing in a lay-down position and travelling to the required depth. This may be up to 1000 m. The casing is typically 0cc13bf012

Human T-cell lymphotropic virus type-1 (HTLV-1) encodes the HTLV-1 virus oncoprotein Tax, which induces cellular proliferation and prevents apoptosis, both of which are key for viral replication. The HTLV-1-encoded Tax protein is a potent activator of transcription through binding to the CREB-binding protein (CREB-BP), a member of the activating transcription factor-2 (ATF-2) family. The CREB-BP gene product CBP is the mammalian homolog of the yeast transcription factor SWI5. The human homolog of SWI5, CREB-binding protein gene product CBP, has the potential to act as both activator or repressor of transcription and also as a cell growth regulator, since it has been shown to inhibit cell-growth through p53 and prevent apoptosis. In this report, we show that Tax binds to CBP in vitro and in vivo and that this interaction inversely correlates with the expression of p53, a natural cellular inhibitor of CBP. We further show that binding of Tax to CBP competitively inhibits the activation of transcription by CREB-BP. We propose that Tax exploits CBP, as a target for activation of transcription, as well as a 'coactivator' for Tax to evade cellular responses against HTLV-1 infection.
