Here we will summarize the main aspects of the Neutrino ransomware. Overview Neutrino ransomware has the ability to encrypt virtual machines, documents, and archives. The malware can also 'back up' the encrypted files to the network drive as a hidden file and encrypts the backed up files too. This ransomware also uses image editing software to create a special ransom note along with an image file as it's a decoy of the ransom note. In some cases the malware is removing the infected system's data, adding a ransom note, and removing the restore partition, too. This patient, as an example of the majority of patients in hospital, is quite rational. He or she then threatens to take legal action against the hospital for being so inefficient. Is this helpful to patients or is this patient just confirming the view that the system is set up in a way that is deeply rooted in an antiquated relational model? I've been reflecting on the idea of a relational hospital model and I think this patient may be someone who would be very hard to treat in such a system.
