Description of Emotions of Love and Relationships Reading Scenario

Sophia is a woman in her thirties who has been living alone for more than a year. Sophia seems to have lost her best friend as her best friend left home one year ago. At that time she was married to a man who changed his mind and heart. So, they are divorced two years ago. Sophia has been in love with her husband and talks to him from time to time. After their marriage, she no longer saw her husband and has been reluctant to make contact. Sophia's current goal is to find a new friend to replace her best friend. She considers that a friend is someone she can reach out to whenever she feels lonely, and that is the main reason behind her search for a new friend. Sophia believes that a lover is different to any other kind of friend because she would want a lover as a best friend. She wants to find a new lover that she can have a best friend relationship with because she feels happy when she talks to her husband or her boyfriend because they are her friends and she would be interested in hearing what they have to say. Sophia is searching for a lover because she likes a man's company, because a couple would be a good friend. She believes that a lover would be a company, someone who can make her laugh and help her feel better at times of stress and loneliness. Sophia would like someone that she can go out with once a week and she would like to meet new people but she does not like to open up about herself very much. Sophia is looking for a man who is willing to help her with her problems as a friend and assist her in finding a suitable lover.

I am a beginner programmer and have a problem with an array in java. In C++ I can create an array like this:
int int_num_array[i][j]; How can I create a similar array in java? A: int int_num_array[][]; is the syntax for defining a multi-dimensional array. A: In Java, you need to define the outer dimension first - int[][][] array = new int[10][10]; As an enterprise grows, the complexity of its services requirements also grows. Enterprises may deploy various software services in attempts to manage their ever-increasing requirements. These services are typically delivered through one or more software management tools, such as, for example, software management consoles, automated systems, and/or other software and/or communication platforms. Some of these management systems may provide management of all of the services deployed by an enterprise (or by certain sets of services), e.g., a services management system. Such a system may monitor various aspects of the software deployed by an enterprise, such as, for example, versioning, security, and so forth. Moreover, some of these management systems may be able to manage the service provider as well. However, currently, enterprises may find it difficult to determine whether services provided by a provider are available for use by an enterprise. For example, a software management system may not be aware that a specific service of a provider is only available to certain versions of a software product or to enterprise-specific implementations of a service. As a result, the management system may not be able to provide proactive management of the software product, or otherwise prevent the enterprise from consuming an unneeded or undesired software product.N,N'-dimethylform
