What's new:

In role-playing games, a base raid (also known as an Imperial raid, Hippy raid, Birk's raid or a Front Page raid) is an event where players take turns to raid (attempt to steal) enemy bases, forcing enemy players to withdraw from their base, hoping to catch that base unguarded before the homefront player returns. Raider and Raider's Raid may also refer to individuals who perform an orchestrated act of base-raid. Base raids have similar meaning to a naval battle in real-world conflicts where an attacking force aims to strike at the enemy's base of operations to inflict damage, sap the opponent's capacity to repel the attacking force and render the defending base incapable of fighting back for any length of time. In roleplaying games, base raids are often used to obtain valuable resources or artefacts from enemy lands or cities and their associated items. Gameplay A "homefront" player (often referred to as the "Raider" or "Birk") attempts to raid the enemy base, leading to a period of "resistance" in which the enemy base must defend itself against the attacking player. The base will attempt to ward off the incoming raider(s), as well as the guardian(s) stationed at other bases. Base guardian stations are often protected by a mysterious repulsive force which may have to be dealt with before the raider can focus on the base at the heart of the raid (if it isn't already protected by guardians). If the raider successfully raids and steals all available resources in the enemy base, the game will end; the raiding player will receive a rating representing a percentage of the resource taken. If the raider does not successfully raid all available resources, the raid is lost and the raiders must start a new raid. The game will end for both raider and homebase player if the raiders do not successfully raid or if the homebase player or any of the raider's patrols get killed. So long as the raider makes all raids and returns safely, the game will continue without any interest by either player in completing the quest to earn "raider points" (RP). Raiding in a base raid is not like real-life raids where only the raiding force is interested in the goods. Instead, a "homebase" player or

"Raider" becomes just as interested in raiding as the attacking force. The raider is constantly logging reports (often when the raider is
