Scientists looking for Bigfoot have just found the best possible place to hide. A two-year government study has uncovered what could be the world's best wooded habitat for this elusive creature. Over a six-year period, scientists surveyed 99 patches of forest in the Pacific Northwest and found that seven had the highest probability of containing Bigfoot, or Sasquatch. Sasquatch: World's best known imaginary being. Out of the three most sought-after spots, the most Bigfoot likely (57 percent) to be found occurred in a patch of forest surveyed in the North Cascades. The second and third most likely places are two separate patches, each about 7,500 square feet, or about the size of a football field, in the Alpine Lakes area in the North Cascades. The US Forest Service provides ample information on the locations of forest patches that meet its patch-size criteria of 4,000 square feet, or the area of a football field, and people can sign up to receive alerts on the locations of these patches. (Read more at the American Chemical Society.) Article continues after advertisement The most likely places to find Bigfoot are the largest patches (F) in the North Cascades. Given the similarities between Bigfoot and bigfoot - as well as the similarities in habitat preferences - the region fittingly felt like the best place to hunt for this legendary creature. "I think it's really nice that we've got a good grasp of where it is," says Bigfoot investigator Eric Christensen, of the Alpine Lakes Research Institute in British Columbia. "We've got people out in the woods now that have the expertise." One specific, much-sought-after patch of forest in the Alpine Lakes area was spotted as the third-most likely place to find Bigfoot in the study. Image courtesy of the US Forest Service. Christensen and his colleagues are interested in Bigfoot because he believes it has some chance of actually existing, and that he can do a good job of finding it when he's out in the woods. "We've seen large groups of human-like animals go off into remote, uninhabited areas to get away from humans," Christensen says. "We see long-distance runners in the woods all the time, and we have seen large non-

Q: Excel VBA: "Data Type Long Integer Overflowed" error I have a code that I run every day to do some computations, and it runs fine on my computer. However, when I tried to run the code on a different computer, it always produces the "Data type long integer overflowed" error. Is there a solution to this problem? Here is my code: Sub Find_Country_by_Ref() Application.ScreenUpdating = False Dim c As Range Set c = Range("A6") c.Value = "India" c.Offset(-1, 0).Value = Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(-1, 0), Range("C7:F51"), 2, False) + c.Offset(-1, 0).Value c.Offset(0, 1).Value = Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(0, 1), Range("C7:F51"), 2, False) c.Offset(0, 0).Value = Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(0, 0), Range("C7:F51"), 2, False) End Sub A: I suspect the Lookup function is returning an error. I would do the lookup using a CSE like MATCH with an absolute reference, and a 0 row and column match. Sub Find_Country_by_Ref() Application.ScreenUpdating = False Dim c As Range Set c = Range("A6") c.Value = "India" c.Offset(-1, 0).Value = _ Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(-1, 0), Range("C7:F51"), 2, 0) + _ Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(-1, 0), Range("C7:F51"), 2, 0) c.Offset(0, 1).Value = _ Application.WorksheetFunction.VLookup(c.Offset(0, 1), Range("C7:F51"), 2, 0) c.Offset(0, 0).Value
