Mysql dbfiddle Michigan State has shown that it can play with elite teams in the Big Ten and that is a great thing for the Buckeyes. As the regular season comes to a close, they've only shown that they have a soft underbelly, which could be problematic when they face top teams like Notre Dame in the postseason. Line up Ohio State at Notre Dame. Notre Dame is one of the best teams in the country, and while they don't quite have Michigan's name recognition, the Fighting Irish are just as hard to beat. The two experienced top-10 offenses will feature a lot of players the other teams will be fighting for, so it will be an incredibly entertaining matchup. As for Ohio State, I don't like them when they're coming out of the bye week. I know they faced Iowa in that game, but without Braxton Miller, Ohio State's offense is at a slight disadvantage. The one exception to that rule is when Braxton Miller comes back, but that is part of a team effort. And when Ohio State starts cranking up the offense, it makes a statement to its opponents. That doesn't necessarily mean that the Buckeyes will win, but it means they have their game-plan working because they aren't relying on the running game to win games. Ohio State did do a good job on defense against Michigan, but what they didn't do was shut down Denard Robinson. I believe Notre Dame's running game will have an advantage over Ohio State's because they have Jermauria Rasco and Corey Robinson. If Notre Dame can establish running lanes against Ohio State's defensive line, the Irish should be able to move the ball and control the clock. If I had to pick a winner of this game, I would give it to the Irish, but I would expect to see plenty of scoring from both sides. Great games don't always happen like this. They often
