DORIAN HALL: The road was built to a tunnel under the Thames by 'Becket'. THE first stretch of the world's longest and most expensive bicycle superhighway route opened today to the general public. The £62.8 million four-mile Translantic Cycle Path opened from Surbiton to Clapham Junction near London Docks as part of the National Cycle Network (NCN). The council says it aims to bring together the islands of transport infrastructure in south London and cut traffic on crowded roads. But it will cost taxpayers at least £148 per family during the lifetime of the project - double the cost of a school car-park. And anyone who uses the path for personal transport faces charges of up to £50. Spokesman for the Walking and Cycling Forum, Roger Geffen, says the best evidence of the amount of traffic it will reduce will be shown by the number of people who make the switch from cycling to bus or train. “We do hope it will reduce traffic - I think if you’re going to use a bike, that’s the way you want to do it,” he said. “The number one reason to ride a bike is because it’s an environment-friendly mode of transport.” Geffen said taxpayers had a right to know how much it cost to create a transport superhighway. “It’s bizarre that you can have this incredible infrastructure that they are spending hundreds of millions of pounds building and nobody knows how much it cost or what the benefit to the taxpayer is,” he said. “I don’t think we should have to pay twice as much to use it.”

Walking and Cycling Forum chief executive Steve Hamilton said the use of the path was a matter of social justice. “People that are rolling in money don’t get to walk or cycle unless they have to pay,” he said. “I think in that respect we are doing something of social justice.” Prime Minister John Key told the Daily Herald a bicycle path was an appropriate project for the government’s Translantic Cycleway programme, since it would encourage healthy exercise while delivering environmental benefits. “No doubt we could have done better, which is why this is being done on the
