Giant cell arteritis (GCA) is one of the most common medium and large artery vasculitis in Western countries and it is often underdiagnosed because of its insidious onset and the lack of specific diagnostic tests. The diagnosis of GCA is based on the clinical manifestations and the 'trinity' of the American College of Rheumatology which consists of three observations: (1) polymyalgia rheumatica (two or more feverish episodes per week) plus the presence of one or more temporal artery tenderness; (2) headache and scalp tenderness; and (3) elevated erythrocyte sedimentation rate and/or C-reactive protein. GCA is difficult to diagnose when it presents as giant cell arteritis in a patient with rapidly progressive inflammatory polymyalgic manifestations. In this setting, an early diagnosis is helpful for the treatment, but there is no consensus on the diagnosis. We present the case of a patient with a rapidly progressive inflammatory polymyalgia characterized by fever, pain in the arms and legs, headache, skin tenderness, pancytopenia, and elevated inflammatory parameters. After application of the classical criteria of the 'trinity', the diagnosis of GCA was rejected due to normal temporal artery biopsy and negative rheumatoid factor. Afterwards, upon anamnesis, we documented the presence of back pain and bilateral conjunctivitis. The patient was finally diagnosed with giant cell arteritis by the anamnestic criteria 'Headache with jaw claudication plus new signs in the lower limbs', raising the suspicion of giant cell arteritis in a patient with a short disease course. This month, I was running some performance tests on our Code T-shirts. I was testing to see if the new "Sprint to Your Site" program would help me meet my goal of getting 100 shirts to our store by October 31st. It only took two weeks! It seems that customers are excited by this program and 0cc13bf012

Her project, titled "The Art of Dying Well," saw thirty artists project "a story about death, dying and the art of dying well," in locations around the world. In the process, the artists created work that used immersive environments, site-specific installation art, and other art forms to help people understand death as a process that is not necessarily scary or stigmatizing, and discuss the universal experience of losing someone close to us. A blog featuring the projects continues to make the journey of loss and death palpable. This week, we pay tribute to artist Paula Green as we remember the work she produced with such great intention and love.
