This project is designed to assess the hypothesis that microbial flora of subgingival sites sampled early in a periodontal disease process are representative of the flora of sites that become diseased and that this flora will, in part, be causally related to the initiation and maintenance of periodontal disease. The flora of subgingival sites sampled at baseline and at 3 and 6 months before re-entry surgery will be determined and compared to baseline and 3 and 6 month post-treatment floras. In addition, a number of non-classically defined bacterial species will be identified and the relationship between these species and disease status will be determined. In this project, microbiological sampling and analysis will be performed in 50 periodontally diseased patients who are undergoing treatment at the University of Connecticut Health Center. The ability to establish the existence and absence of a microbial agent in the periodontal pocket will be determined. Additionally, individuals not suffering from periodontal disease will be sampled and the nature of the microbial consortia will be assessed to establish the normal periodontal flora. In clinical trials, 20 sites will be sampled at baseline, 3 and 6 months prior to treatment and sites will be re-sampled at 3 and 6 months post-treatment. Samples of a number of potential etiologic agents will be isolated, purified and quantitated using classical microbiological techniques. The relationship between this flora and the presence of gingivitis, pocket depth, attachment level and clinical attachment loss will be assessed. Horses with different combinations of acute or chronic states of anemia have been shown to respond to hemorrhage by altering circulating red cell concentrations of various macromolecular components of the blood. However, blood in the organism is a complex fluid that contains numerous small molecules that may be sensitive to the influence of acute or chronic blood loss. Therefore, this study was undertaken to identify potential changes in the plasma concentrations of metabolites that potentially relate to the responses observed in the concentrations of several erythrocyte constituents in horses that have been subjected to hemorrhage.
