Galagan's Island: Metagalactic Monstrosities

In this third and final installment in the official Galagan's Island series, you travel the galaxy as a female bounty hunter with the goal of finding and capturing what remains of the infamous Galagan...and of course - making enough credits to get off this rock. No dialog, No main quests, No cars, no nothin's expected from you... except maybe a few extra credits at the end. Just chase, kill, grab and avoid those nasty things that shoot at you. Click and unload all your abilities at all the enemies in your way and grab what you want. Galagan's Island is a great, simple and fun experience with a great amount of enemies and surprises. Don't just shoot your enemies, also try to grab them. The Forgotten Colossus is a platformer/puzzle/action hybrid game for the PC, originally released in 2015. It tells the story of a hero, Sara, as she sets off on her adventure to save her father, a military scientist, after he has been abducted by the evil villainess, Megabolt. It takes place in a sci-fi themed environment which is made of many different levels, including flying around the planet as a jetpack, climbing large structures with the help of a special hammer, and even battling enemies in zero gravity. Its story is told mainly through cutscenes, in which a narrator explains the events that occur in each level.

Broken-Era - An amnesiac man wakes up on the anniversary of his wife's death and finds that she is alive and well, living on a remote Pacific island. He later learns that she is not real, and that he has been duped into traveling to the island to search for her. Traveling around the island, he discovers that it has no traces of civilization and all the other inhabitants are monsters who have somehow managed to hide themselves from humanity. But the man is unable to return to civilization because the ship he boarded on the mainland is stranded on the opposite end of the island. Slowly the man begins to remember the things that happened before and during his wife's kidnapping. With his memory returning, he discovers that he must escape the island with his life, because he is trapped there as well.

Of course, galaxies are clustered, so that Galactic Central is, in practice, spread over a huge region. The whole Milky Way fits in a cube with the volume of a tank, with dimensions on the order of five million light years across. Most other organized stars and nebulae are seemingly interspersed with the stars inside that large cube, but there is of course an edge; it is impossible to visit a galaxy which stretches back to beyond even the distance to Galactic Central, because that galaxy will have its own sun which would burn out the local stars before a ship from the outside could get very far. The distances and relative speeds between galaxies are vitally important to the whole galactic civilization. From Earth it is possible to send a message to another star at speeds a mere two thousandths of the speed of light. (For fun and argument, suppose that that was four billion years ago, when galactic civilization was founded. Then it will still be just a couple of days of relativity for any ships arriving here from other galaxies to reach us. They'd be four billion years older, which might make a difference in their response to us if one of the Great Powers decided to attack and annihilate us; but that seems rather like a last resort if that power's entire civilization was comfortably settled down with a good, long life.) A very few passengers on a spaceship could possibly travel that far in a year or even less, but communication is the key to galactic empire: the profit on investments is almost pure uni-dimensionality, because the more civilizations you can communicate with, the more useful you can be to them. It is a common assumption among the Galaxy's inhabitants that the brainpower of the civilization is centralized in the core, where the larger population would concentrate. But the backward extrapolations of the speed of light make it clear that interstellar communication would be difficult if it actually happened at a distance of ten thousand light years. Almost anyone is going to have to leave before the third of the distance in order to have any chance of communication at all. Only a tiny percentage of the population would even be where the
