Embarcadero Rad Studio Seattle. Instalaezã în mod gratuit.Availability Embarking upon epic journeys on their own terms in the 1990s with a group of friends, Gary Hustwit and Jason Wise turned the camera on and let the world know their unconventional side. Drawn to extreme sports and their uses as social commentary, the Hustwit/Wise team compiled a eclectic body of work for their series of shows, including "Two Hours in New York," "Man Bites Dog," "The Bonfire of the Vanities" and "Get Real." Through a network of friends, friends of friends, and even friends of the friends of their friends, they found themselves running into tons of low-income Manhattan households to capture the subculture of foot traffic and street life in its most saturated zones. Their footage from the nights spent hanging out, waiting for taxis, and getting into car accidents was intercut with a series of documents that tell stories of the disenfranchised in New York. These included a detailed report on the quality of Central Park restrooms, an archive of New York's high- and low-end bike and car accident reports and footage of City Council hearings over graffiti removals. After Hustwit and Wise's death in 2004, their partner in crime, filmmaker Charles Thomson (brother of Steppenwolf) compiled the footage, which was shown at the Museum of Modern Art in February 2008. From Hustwit and Wise's iconic video cover, where two high school pals are jumping off a bridge, to their last-ever film, titled, "Get Real," where a group of directors capture cars being stripped of all their electronic accessories for salvage, "2 Hours in New York" is the work that sums up the four years of documentary filmmaking that these two best friends put together.
