Read full story here: As we enter the third week of the Apple vs. FBI Controversy, there have been multiple lawsuits filed in a bid to get Apple to assist the government in hacking the iPhone of San Bernardino shooter Syed Farook. The FBI has stated that they were unable to access data stored on his device. In response, Apple has essentially caved to public opinion, and has agreed to help. In their letter, Apple stated "Although the FBI may not have been able to access the data on Farook's iPhone, we can provide a special tool that will help the FBI by taking any semiautomatic encryption apart, brick by brick, so the FBI can get access to the data." The letter comes just days after Apple COO, Tim Cook, called for stronger encryption across all mobile devices so that "bad actors" cannot bypass security. This is where the proposed law S. 1619 comes into play. The bill, introduced by Senators Richard Burr and Dianne Feinstein, seeks to force all technology companies to create a "backdoor" to all encrypted information. The bill is part of the 2015 San Bernardino Terrorist Attack Unified Assistance Act, but was not included in the final bill passed by Congress, and seems unlikely to ever become law. Still, the FBI and other law enforcement groups have voiced their support of the bill, stating that they do not have time to wait for a legal situation to develop that will allow for this legislation to be passed in the future.
