Handling events is not necessary to check the results, even when you want to verify which attribute has been changed. What you need is the updated value. Use GetElementByAttribute() to get this. You may have noticed System.Web.UI.Control.Update() is an overloaded method, it has two versions: one that handles events, and one that doesn't. The interface version provides a very easy way to make the control update. The event version is useful for updating the control from the server (such as when an update is made from a web service). You can use the Update() method with any update attribute (field.update) by itself. It has no parameters. The fields are already updated by default. If you want to update other attributes, you can use the overloaded version of the Update() method. How to use the Update() method for an event attribute In an ASP.NET Web Forms page, use one of these three lines of code to update an attribute for a control in response to a button press: You do not need to manipulate events when you want to check the results. The events are the cues that cause the results to appear (and disappear). Once you have the updated values, you can manipulate them in any way you want. Visual Studio features a special formatter for HTML that helps you format your HTML by class. Find the formatter icon in the toolbar of a web forms designer window (shown in Figure 4) or click File>Options>Web Forms Designer. If you do not see the button, you may need to display the Microsoft HTML Helpers Toolbar (see Figure 5). In ASP.NET Web Forms with
