great friend to someone like that. She's got two friends who talk about "Marriage" like you do. Though neither of them met the other until they moved in together. "Marriage" is their standard, and they were together 5 years before they were "married". My grandma, a Korean woman in her late sixties, would have called you "our friend". I'm sure you don't remember this, but when I was in university in the mid-90s, I had a roommate who was a divorced single mom with a child, and her ex-husband was her student. Now here's what I found interesting: we were roommates for 6 months. From the time we moved in together, he was 30 years younger than she was. 6 months was 2 years. He was going to school for a 4 year bachelor's degree; she was teaching in an on-line university. His major was applied mathematics, her major was communication, and she would say that she was teaching to help him. While he was studying, she helped him with his homework, and he helped her with hers. They actually didn't socialize with each other, except to eat together. When I was talking to her this past week, I asked her if there had been any physical attraction between them. She said, "Oh, he was very nice to me. But he really just wanted to be close to my son." Yes, she had never met his dad before they moved in together, and after that move, they had no contact at all. And so she never dated until they decided to get married. She and I had a laugh about his "studying to help her with hers", and she said that, by the time he completed his program, he had her pretty much where he wanted her. Dear Heart, it can happen to anyone of us. We had a laugh about his being nice to her, and I mentioned that 6d1f23a050
