Osteoporosis is a condition in which increased bone resorption decreases bone density, resulting in increased risk of fragility fracture. It often occurs in patients with advanced cancer. For such patients, anti-resorptive treatment should be considered to reduce osteoporotic fractures and their morbidity and mortality. It is important to balance the treatment effect against the adverse effects including the quality of life (QOL). In this article, we discuss anti-osteoporotic treatments for patients with bone metastasis. Although the effect of anti-resorptive treatment on bone mineral density (BMD
