Å .Composition of human meconium and small intestinal contents. To clarify the chemical composition of human meconium and the contents of the proximal small intestine (PSI), we examined the contents of these materials obtained from deceased neonates (n = 18). We measured both the composition of fluids aspirated from the PSI via a nasogastric tube and the content of amniotic fluid (AF) aspirated via a puncture in the skin of the chest. The fluid aspirated from the PSI of neonates with meconium peritonitis (NMP) was very similar to AF (composition, pH, and osmolality); however, the fluid aspirated from the PSI of neonates without meconium peritonitis (nMP) and those without abdominal distension was more diluted (p less than 0.05), and the pH and osmolality of the fluid in the PSI were significantly different from those of AF (p less than 0.05). Although the occurrence of meconium peritonitis was accurately predicted by the presence of meconium in the PSI and AF, the risk of meconium peritonitis could not be predicted by the pH or osmolality of the fluid in the PSI. We propose that meconium in the PSI is responsible for the transudation of fluid into the PSI, which dilutes the PSI contents. The results of this study support the proposition that the use of meconium peritonitis to predict the occurrence of meconium ileus in the PSI may not be accurate because of the dilution of the PSI contents.
