Download it here. FACT: there are people who still take journalists seriously. This is a story you could call 'The Moment of Truth' for its publication revealed such a worrying scenario of 'fake news' and 'post-truth' that you could have easily written it off as far-fetched fantasy. However, as the fake news story unfolded, there was no denying its detailed storyline. If you want to see what this is about and read how the team behind 'the moment of truth' worked, look no further. The idea: It started when Boris Johnson was making some 'extraordinary statements' (in the words of Prashanth Venkataramanan). The UK Prime Minister was quoted as saying that the 'deal was worse than no deal', adding that he should not be 'surrounded by fraudsters and rogues' after the Parliament voted to ask for an extension to the Brexit deadline. He continued by saying that if he wanted to go down the 'road of no deal, he would go down it', adding that he would take Britain back to 'that deep dark sea of history'. However, soon after Johnson's comments, the so-called 'BrexTit Hell' broke out again, in what has become a horrifying on/off cycle, with the Government attempting to get a last-minute extension to the Article 50 deadline, while MPs have threatened to force the Prime Minister out of office. The reports soon created a lot of fuss, with many journalists, including BBC's Martin Brunt, pointing out the fake news. However, after a report appeared stating that the BBC was paying for a 'troll farm' to push fake news and post-truth stories, the media house admitted that the story was true. From that, a bizarre and funny story was formed. Boris Johnson - fake news king However, this 'fake news' story wasn't the only one that was debunked. The
