We reviewed relevant literature to identify differences between traditional and opioid medications in the risk of suicidal behavior. The literature was reviewed using the Medline and PubMed databases, with the keywords suicide and pain, antidepressants, opioids, and the date range 1980-2013. The gray literature and personal communications were also reviewed. Although several studies have reported suicidal behavior as an adverse effect of traditional antidepressants, opioids have not been shown to have any adverse effect on the risk of suicide. There are at least three reasons for this inconsistency. First, the sample sizes of the studies have been inadequate to detect a difference between these groups. Second, studies that demonstrated increased risk for suicide associated with traditional antidepressants included older individuals and were based primarily on retrospective data, which have the potential to be subject to selection bias. Finally, most studies of opioids, with few exceptions, have not included suicide as a study endpoint. The data suggest that while opioid medications, especially short-acting agents, do have some adverse effects, these effects are not of clinical importance and not necessarily suicidal. Given the known risks of serotonin reuptake inhibitors, particularly in older individuals, they should be used cautiously in persons taking opioids. However, despite reports that opioids may have a suicidal effect, the available data suggest that this is not of clinical significance. The Fight Isn't Just About You, It's About Us All Barry Davis, who was dealt with alcoholism, tried to kill himself four times. If someone had intervened and asked the basic questions that led to his successful recovery, Davis might have been saved, his family say. In a difficult time when many adults are struggling with addiction and 12-step programs see declines, it's vital for children to see their parents and people they know in a happy, healthy and hopeful state of mind. There are many treatment options available for families and individuals, and children are
