On March 9, the Washington Post's Colby Itkowitz published a tongue-in-cheek article entitled, "Crack Pie Is Still Worse Than you Think." The article profiled a man, a total stranger to them, who had been arrested in 2009 in northern Virginia for possession of over one-half ounce of crack cocaine and thousands of dollars. While he is no longer in trouble for the drug, (he eventually pleaded guilty to possession of half a gram of cocaine base), that arrest left him with an unfortunate encounter. His name is Randy Barr, and he's a die-hard fan of Milk Bars Crack Pie. "When you combine that with Milk Bars catchy slogan, theres really only one thing you can do: take Crack Pie and give it back," Barr wrote in an email to the Post after reading the article. Milk Bar has been offering the dessert since 2008, but did nothing to cease its use of the name until later that year. Milk Bars president and co-founder Andrea Pappalardo told the Boston Globe that the inspiration for the pastry came from Pappalardo's own childhood, where she would eat an orange flavoured oatmeal cookie, and then call it crack. Though Milk Bars Crack Pie may not be sanctioned by the company, a quick search online revealed theres more than a few online recipes, both for Crack Pie and the traditional chocolate peanut butter pie it was named after. Many non-profit organizations using the site with the pie are more supportive and look forward to their meals. While the pastry may be an enjoyable treat for the individual making it, critics say its use by the eatery is upsetting for the people whose communities were most affected by the crack epidemic, a fact that the company may not realize.

I hope it isnt, since I like pie a lot. I think its name is perfectly descriptive. And I believe that most of the pie makers, as a result of criticism, are trying to modernize their product to appeal to a new generation of consumers. Who knows, maybe a Milk Bar Pie, covered with a layer of chocolate frosting, will truly be a modern take on the old Crack Pie.
