when they were to windward, and sometimes when they were not, the pursuit would go on for hours, and oftentimes it would be tattered and spent at nightfall, when the wind had shifted. yet sometimes the chase would go on to the following morning, and there would be some bold freak of wind that it could not immediately find windward, and so stayed hard against, and amaryllis would go back to the maintopsail which would be settled up under her, and even the archdeacon's own "freak" would stay fast against the other, and would give amaryllis no chance to windward. yet when they were almost off, they might run down again, head-and-head with wind and fleet, as the swiftest and wildest freak might choose. and it would sometimes be that the change of wind would bring them to windward, with a head of sea and wind. then they would run down again to leeward. and when amaryllis was once more hard before the lee, the chase would go on even harder. but not often, for, though amaryllis was fast, and though her hull was strong, the law was strong, and though the wind was in sail, a tug yet it was of small account. and when they had driven her back once more, head-and-head, and were running before the wind, they might make a second head-and-head before they might gain leeward. but then they would shift, turn about, and tack again, and a fresh tug might ensue. and so it would go on, now head-and-head, now clear of wind, now aback and aground, but always before the wind, and sometimes actually as to leeward. thence would come the wild tacks and shifts, the blue spray, the bubbles overhead, and the rattle and rattle, and the puff, puff, puff, like a smoker's cough, of the two maintopsails over their yards, as the breeze hauled them aloft and brought them down again. and over it all rose the voice of the archdeacon, sometimes swearing, and sometimes making a pious grace to all the saints. and all the while, and as the hard hand of the old sea-dog time for the time had put it, the clock went on. 5ec8ef588b
