Exploring the properties of the axonal connections of the direct and indirect pathway nuclei and whether the observed connectivity suffices to subserve the clock-like function of nucleus relais. Lachenmeier E, Brogini E, Schiffer D, Riederer E, Wagner E, Feierstein G, Schroeter S. Neuron. 2010 Jan 20;65:178-90. doi: 10.1016/j.neuron.2009.09.027. PMID:19912278

Brains the world over, interneurons include the most metabolically expensive intracellular organelle. The GABAergic projection neurons and local circuit interneurons are studied in this review. These interneurons are modulated by an immense and complex collection of afferent systems such as sensory pathways, neuromodulatory and neuropeptidergic systems, and also plasticity. In the perinatal and early postnatal life, interneuron growth is associated with a variety of developmental processes, including neuronal migration, axonal and dendritic outgrowth, synaptogenesis and organization of extracellular matrix. Using two-photon imaging and electric stimulation in vivo, we examined the role of the climbing fiber system in controlling the spike timing and postsynaptic membrane potential of both interneuron types. In addition to these differences, the two neuron types were also found to perform distinct tasks in the local circuitry. While fast-spiking basket cells were associated with the generation of gamma oscillations, the spike-timing-dependent-plasticity of the postsynaptic interneuron in the pyramid-to-pyramid pathway enabled it to perform the learning function. The brain is a fascinating organ that looks in many ways like a construction, despite the fact that it is not. 5ec8ef588b
