Mukerji previously directed a couple of notable documentaries, including Bollywood's First Queerie (2016) and Tani Miss Tanne (2006). 3 Storeys is supposed to be a dark thriller based on the narratives of intersex people in India. If there is a gender-neutral version of a person, and the person also shows intersex characteristics, then that person is classified as [atypical,] The filmmakers apparently did not develop the movie with the audience in mind. The upper space, the narrative space of the story, can be understood as the experience of the American college student. The middle space is cultural space of the movie, which is a space of the American culture. Jobs in the film industry are difficult, but hopefully the competition level is getting smaller all the time. Before shooting I only knew about common standards, not these specific ones. Kaur is a highly capable filmmaker: Her first feature, 3 Storeys, announces its arrival with a whiplash bang as the lead character, Varsha, is arrested for theft, then delivered from jail to her home by the boy she is in love with, and finally caught up in the crashing of their extended families' lives. This film can be the start of a conversation about intersex rights in India. It can also be a conversation about the inability to help and the complexity of social problems. Eka may be the exact expression of this self-discovery process. Multiple literary and cinematic references to Indian literature and culture can even suggest that more intersex movies can be made.
