Then we came to the long tunnel, and stopped, and got out. The car got out too. The moon was full and it was like being on the earth in middle of a lunar eclipse. We sat on the sill of the opening looking out over the valley, not having the usual tourist feeling of being where the world was young, but with the feeling you have when for the first time you see something with the clearest vision of its history, Then we changed and the cushion was fresh, and my tooth gleamed, and we went down the peak to Goldape where our car was kept for us in the yard. I was very excited. I had to make a speech tonight and I rehearsed it. It was all about Jiminy Crickets. It was a real masterpiece. Japhy had written a little speech for me to say and I rehearsed it. We made sure we had all our spacesuits. I looked fine in it, and so did Japhy, in the front. We were every inch professional astronauts. We had worked out the script and the mise en scene. The only thing which was a bit fuzzy was our patter and when to shout 'FIRE IN THE GUTTER' and I got a bit confused in the putting in of the glasses of mate, to warm us up while we rehearsed. We got into the boot of the car (in our spacesuits) and started out on the trip. The fog had cleared and it was very beautiful, quite a change from yesterday. But even better than that, the whole world seemed to be glowing with sunshine and a million stars were out. The hills were dark with fir. They went slowly down the highway and as we descended it seemed the world rolled away beneath us and we were going into another century. Everywhere out there on the slopes and in the valleys of Silver City were the little toylike villages of the mining camps, all with their smokestacks standing watchfully into the sea wind. All had the innocence of a toy town, put here hundreds of years before as if by alchemy, and with all the stolidity of the potlatch.
