if you're lucky enough to have ever been a part of this crazy world, one of the coolest things about it is the ability to contribute to it, whether it be money, time, or knowledge. if i hadn't been born, it's very likely i would have never been a part of that world at all, a trio of german speakers, ben freirich, sebastian buchner, and maxime moerkeld spoke with svp for business development | gaming andreas g nther about their company's plans to take the esports world by storm. the project was put together by the emo sports agency, who set the development of the game in motion about a year ago. the team of 50 developers has been working together for three years on the project, which aims to capture the esports spirit of the traditional sports world and add digital gaming content for the community. after working with virtual martial artists for years, g nther followed up by saying that they are particularly passionate about training their developers in-house, but are always open to reaching out to established companies in the gaming industry. they believe, however, that it's not about turning their people into copycats, but rather, to be a part of the industry. sennheiser, the world's leading provider of wireless and mobile communications solutions, is setting new standards for musicians. its unique game tv microphone series for professional video production provides superb sound quality and the most reliable wireless transmission technology. they are particularly excited about the spectating experience, which is meant to simulate the competitive environment of a live match, including the introduction of a dedicated spectator section on top of the stage. in addition, the tournament will have all the bells and whistles of an official event: a trophy, a certificate, and more. the world championship takes place from july 16 to july 30 at poznan's national stadium.
